OBJECTIVE

When deciding between an objective and a summary for your resume, it's important to consider your current situation, target audience, and resume format. Ask yourself if you have relevant experience or skills for the new career. If so, a summary might be more effective to demonstrate your competence and potential. If not, an objective might be more suitable to explain your career change and learning ability. Additionally, consider if you know the specific role or industry you want to pursue. If yes, an objective might be more helpful to show your alignment and interest. If no, a summary might be more flexible to highlight your general skills and value. Lastly, think about the type of resume you have; a chronological resume lists work experience in reverse order, so a summary might be more logical to summarize your main points. A functional resume focuses on skills and achievements, so an objective might be more necessary to provide context and direction. For a hybrid resume that combines both formats, you can choose either option depending on your preference and goal.

SKILLS

- Communication skills

Effective communication skills are a prerequisite for most jobs. Ensure that the skills section of your resume includes achievements that involve interacting well with others and highlights "verbal and written communication."

Adaptability
A rapidly changing job market needs candidates who can handle ever-shifting demands and continue to excel at their jobs. Your ability to adapt to new surroundings is a plus in your resume skills section. Add examples of how you've been able to go with the flow and adapt to what companies need.
